The question of a return to a specie currency in the South meets with much comment, and the difficulties in the way of such a result are less than might be supposed. Our staple is finally purchased for gold by the manufacturers of England and France. Why should we not demand this gold payment direct? With specie adopted as our currency for cotton we would be in a better condition to-day than our neighbors of the North, who have just passed through a series of years of unexampled prosperity, but who are subject to the variations.
